WEB SITES

Web sites vary widely in the type of information they present and the way it is presented. APA assumes you will be using scholarly web sites and recommends “that you include the same elements, in the same order, as you would for a reference to a fixed-media source and add as much electronic retrieval information as needed for others to locate the sources you cited.” (187).

In-text Parenthetical Documentation Guidelines

Whenever you use someone else’s words, numbers or ideas you must give credit. Failure to do so could result in accusations of plagiarism, with potential penalties including course failure, suspension and even expulsion from the College.

The goal of in-text documentation is to clearly and concisely direct the reader to the appropriate citation on the References page without interrupting the flow of the paper. There are a number of ways to format in-text documentations; the best is the one that meets these goals.

If you are directly quoting an author, include the last name of the author (thus linking it to the full citation in the References list), followed by a comma, the year of publication, another comma, and the page number of the quote preceded by p.

Researchers and dog owners agree that dogs “have an uncanny ability to read human body language” (Hickey, 2004, p. 9).

If you are paraphrasing an author’s work or idea, include the last name of the author followed by a comma and the year of publication.

Some researchers (Marzula, 2002) suggest dogs are born with the ability to communicate well with humans.

Alternatively, you can name the author in the sentence, leaving only the year to be included in parentheses.

According to Mary Carmichael’s ground breaking article (2003), all animals experience fear and many may also experience love.

If you are quoting someone interviewed in a book or article, you use as cited in documentation. Note that you must identify the speaker and the author of the article where the quote appeared.

Jon Katz, author of many books on dogs, describes dogs as “scholars of the people they live with” (as cited in Carmichael, 2003, p. 46).
